

A Career in World News

A career in world news offers an exciting opportunity to report on global events, uncover stories, and influence public understanding of current affairs. Journalists in this field often work for international news outlets, TV networks, or online platforms, covering topics ranging from politics and economics to culture and environmental issues.

In the UK, world news reporters may begin their careers at major broadcasters like the BBC or Sky News, or with prominent newspapers such as The Guardian or The Times. Entry-level salaries for journalists typically range between £20,000 and £30,000 per year, with experienced correspondents earning upwards of £50,000. Top-tier international correspondents can command salaries exceeding £80,000.

To prepare for this career, suggested A-levels include English, History, Politics, or Languages, which develop skills in writing, research, and critical thinking. Many pursue journalism degrees or postgraduate training, though practical experience and internships are equally valuable.

World news journalism demands curiosity, resilience, and adaptability but offers a rewarding path for those passionate about storytelling and global issues.
